development teams is currently constrained by the suboptimal furniture layout in [REDACTED] [REDACTED] To enhance productivity and enable essential team collaboration, a new space configuration has been designed. This new layout requires the procurement of specific furniture that is smaller than the existing desks. A critical and non-negotiable requirement is that any new material must be fully compatible in form, fit, and function with the furniture systems presently installed in the building. This constraint is essential for two primary reasons: first, to maintain uniformity and ensure new components can be physically integrated with existing ones; and second, because the new layout was designed around the precise dimensions of this specific furniture system. Any deviation would render the new design unworkable. Proceeding with a full and open competition would introduce an unacceptable risk to the program. An award to a vendor of a non-compatible product would trigger a cascade of negative consequences, including an estimated three-month delay in conducting a complete space redesign and a new procurement cycle. This delay carries a direct financial impact of over [REDACTED] in excess costs, which could not be recovered. Therefore, limiting competition is the only viable path to meet the government's minimum needs in a timely and fiscally responsible manner.

3. Market research included reviewing the current infrastructure, performing internet searches, and obtaining market research quotes. This market research has shown that Vari Sales Corporation, a small business concern and the original equipment manufacturer, has multiple authorized resellers available to include under the National Aeronautics and Space Administration Solutions for Enterprise-Wide Procurement. In addition, Vari Sales Corporation currently holds a General Services Administration Federal Supply Schedule.
